I have stopped off in New York, en route home from Paris, in order to do some book-related stuff. First, an event at Barnes & Noble to celebrate the publication of THE CHRONICLES OF HARRIS BURDICK with the illustrations by Chris Van Allsburg, who was at the event along with Jon Scieska, Linda Sue Park and me, the three of us among the 14 writers who contributed stories to go with Chris's illustrations. Chris and I will do another such event in Cambridge, MA (Brattle Theater, 6 PM) this coming Friday night, along with Roger Sutton as moderator and Margaret Raymo, the editor of the book.

That event was yesterday. Today I was at Scholastic Books doing a live webcast...I'm told that perhaps 4,000 teachers had signed up, and of course each teacher had a classroom of kids..so it was a huge audience. We were talking about the Dear America series, and with me were Lisa Sandell, the editor of the series; and Kirby Larson, who wrote this one:

set in 1941; and also Andrea Davis Pinkney, author of set in 1954; and then my book was/is

How do you find a little girl in a house of horrors, and how do you find a girl who is so kind and brave in the face of the world?

What is it like to be a girl who is so brave and so kind in the face of the world? What is it like to be a girl who is so brave and so kind in the face of the world?
